I AM NOT BOUND TO WIN

I am not bound to win,
But I am bound to be true,
I am not bound to succeed,
But I am bound to live up to what light I have.
I must stand up with anybody that stands right;
Stand with him while he is right,
And part with him when he goes wrong.

-- Abraham Lincoln

THE RISE AND FALL OF LONE STAR, KANSAS

by Paul H. Nieder
 16 July 1975

INTRODUCTION

Lone Star, Kansas is located approximately 12 miles southwest of Lawrence. It occupies a rather scenic site nestled against the south ridge of the Washington Creek valley. Washington Creek, a permanent stream, skirts the townsite on the east and south. The main road leading from Lawrence toward southwest Douglas County forks at Lone Star. One road continues up the valley toward Lone Star Lake which was built by the Civilian Conservation Corps during the New Deal. The other crosses Washington Creek and continues south toward southern Douglas County. Lone Star was never served by a railroad. The nearest shipping point has always been at Lawrence except for a brief period in the 1880's and 1890's when Clinton four and one-half miles to the north served that purpose.

Lone Star today contains approximately 15 residences. One of these has been converted from the former community school. Another has been vacated in recent years. In addition there is a church, bank building and former Ford garage. Of these only the church continues to perform its original function. The landmark of the town, the Flory store and hall, was demolished in the spring of 1975, slightly over one-hundred years after the founding of the town. The population of the town is probably nearly as large today as it ever was. However, all residents are either retired or gain their livelihood elsewhere.

Over the course of the last one-half century, Lone Star has slowly lost the social, economic, institutional and service functions that qualified it as an important central place. It is the main purpose of this paper to reconstruct the social and economic character of the Lone Star community during the years that it was acquiring and maintaining its reasons for existence. Secondly, the information presented will be used to test some assumptions about the impact of 20th century conditions upon rural communities. This paper is not intended to be the history of a community or a small town.

Those seeking such a history of the Lone Star community, at this point in time, will have to write it themselves. The reader may, however, be able to discern, at least in broad outline, what such a history might entail.

PART I

The establishment of Bond, Kansas¹ as a central place of significance occurred over the course of some 20 years between the mid-1870's and the mid-1890's.² The establishment of the original post office in 1875 should be used as the date for the founding of the town even though that post was not located at the eventual town site but was moved there at a slightly later date.³ In the early 1880's the school for Douglas County District Number 47 was moved to the town site. Apparently the first business enterprises appeared at Bond (Lone Star) in the mid-1880's.⁴ By the late 1880's several businesses had appeared at Bond (Lone Star) and the population had reached approximately 10.⁵ By 1891 the population had reached approximately 25.⁶ Three years later the population had climbed to about 44, which is almost as many permanent residents as the town would ever have.⁷

It is extremely difficult to reconstruct the demographic character of the Lone Star community.⁸ State and federal census data was collected for townships and incorporated towns. In the investigation of any smaller area the exact statistical picture cannot be reconstructed because the addresses of residents were not recorded.⁹ The situation is further complicated by the fact that the Lone Star community (as defined here) lay within no less than three townships: Clinton, Marion and Willow Springs.

A generalized picture of population trends can be derived from the census records, surviving atlas and maps plus the recollections of long-time residents of the community. The federal census records include the following totals for the three rural townships in question:

	1860	1870	1880	1890	1900	1910	1920	1930	1940	1975	est.
Clinton	655	1030	1005	968	947	761	745	652	541	342
Marion	416	879	1417	1406	1357	1187	1061	934	817	631
Willow Springs	931	1163	1374	1223	1278	1278	1034	943	881	837	¹⁰

One clear generalization can be derived from these statistics: the population of rural southwest Douglas County peaked between 1880 and 1890 and declined rather steadily thereafter. Did this general population trend apply specifically to the Lone Star community? A compilation of the number of farmsteads within two miles of Lone Star that were recorded on various surviving maps sheds some light on this question:

	1873	1887	1902	1921
Clinton	31	33	29	29	*Includes approx. nine residences in Lone Star
Marion	8	9	17*	20
Willow Springs	11	9	10	8	Includes approx. twelve residences in Lone Star ¹¹
	50	51	56	57

Even though these figures can only be considered as approximate, they do clearly indicate a slight decline of rural population contemporaneous with the growth of the town of Lone Star itself.¹² If we envision such small towns as the product of the goods and services they provide their immediate rural communities it is difficult to account for a growing town in a shrinking rural community. Another complicating factor was the introduction of the automobile in the second decade of the 20th century. The mobility provided by the automobile should have reduced rural dependence upon goods and services provided at Lone Star, but apparently it did not, at least not at first.¹³

A review of the land ownership patterns within two miles of Lone Star sheds little light on the changing demographic picture. The surviving maps indicate that the size of ownership units has not changed dramatically over the last 100 years. In the latter decades of the 19th century ownership units in the vicinity of Lone Star were frequently large. Quite a few of these ran several hundred acres in size. Most ownerships units, however, were 40, 80 or 160 acres in size. There were several clusters of very small ownership units without farmsteads which apparently served as wood lots. The size of present day ownership units follows the same general pattern; some larger ownership units are mixed with a larger number of medium-sized ones and some small ones (which generally contain the homes of rural commuters).

The dramatic change has come not in the size of ownership units but rather in the size of farm operational units. Farm operational units in general have become ever larger over the last 100 years with the most dramatic increase taking place in the post-World War II period. In the long run what is reflected here is the switch from labor-intensive agriculture to labor-extensive agriculture. This trend accounts for much of the decline in rural population especially in the mid-20th century.¹⁴

PART II

The first service provided at a central point in what became known as the Lone Star community was a post office established in 1875.¹⁵ The early post office moved from home to home or from one business to another with several changes of postmasters.¹⁶ In the 1880's the mail was delivered "semi-weekly" from Lawrence.¹⁷ Postal patrons picked up their mail at the post office before rural free delivery was established in the early years of the 20th century. Even after the establishment of rural free delivery, the Lone Star post office continued to serve the community for many years.¹⁸

The first school to serve what became known as the Lone Star community was located a little over one mile southeast of the present town site and was established sometime before 1873.¹⁹ The school was moved to Bond (Lone Star) in the early 1880's.²⁰ The school was first referred to as Lone Star in the board minutes for the December 18, 1897 meeting.²¹ A new school building had been completed in the fall and winter of 1895-96 and Lone Star was the name selected for the new school. That school continued to serve the community with eight grades of instruction in a single room for over 60 years. The enrollment in the Lone Star elementary school declined from well over 50 at the turn of the century to about 40 in 1920, and finally fell to around 12 just before the school was consolidated.²²

A highly significant step in the integration of the Lone Star community was taken in 1905 with establishment of the Lone Star Mutual Telephone Company. This cooperative telephone company had a local operator and served

This chart shows a clear growth in the number of services and the sophistication of goods provided at Lone Star for the town itself and for the adjacent rural community. This growth is especially marked in the first and second decade of the 20th century at the same time the automobile was beginning to have an impact on rural America. This raises a question about the impact of the automobile. Did it break down the cohesion of rural communities as is frequently assumed, or, did it in fact enhance that cohesion? The evidence presented here indicates that it did the latter, at least initially.

Several social and social service organizations were associated with the Lone Star community in the first few decades of the 20th century. The Lone Star Brass Band was one active group. Besides performing for the community at its own bandstand, it played at picnics and ball games at Lone Star and nearby communities.³⁵ The Lone Star Fraternal Aid Association maintained a lodge which was used as a meeting place by various social groupings.³⁶ The Lone Star Ladies Aid functioned as a church related service organization.³⁷ The Lone Star Civic Protective Association was apparently one of the more important social organizations in spite of its businesslike title.³⁸ The Lone Star Jolly Stitchers Club combined sewing with social intercourse.³⁹ The Lone Star Literary Society combined debates and discussions with social intercourse.⁴⁰ Somewhat more businesslike was the Lone Star Farmers Union which represented the interests of the local agriculturalists.⁴¹

In addition to the activities of specific organizations, more casual community social activities occurred in considerable variety. These included Fourth of July picnics, "tent" or "camp" meetings for religious revival, Chautauqua lectures with music and entertainment, skating parties, ball games (enough players for three teams between 1910 and 1920), "wolf hunts" (actually the round-up of coyotes), school sponsored spelling bees and Christmas parties, movies and just plain "socials" both within and among communities.⁴² This degree of social activity centered at Lone Star indicates the existence of a rural community with considerable social cohesion. Indeed, it is probable the primary integrative factors within the community were social rather than economic.

CONCLUSION

Lone Star was a partial service community of considerable significance to the immediate rural area. Around 1918, for example, one might have to journey to Lawrence only to market his grain or livestock, purchase major vehicles, household furniture, appliances, implements and some building materials. The resident of the community could bank locally, have his implements and automobiles repaired in many cases, gain medical attention for his family and livestock, send his children to school, attend church, purchase food and clothing, have some of his produce marketed and/or processed, receive mail (and, very importantly, mail order merchandise), belong to a number of social and social service organizations and take part in a variety of social and recreational activities.

The most interesting and difficult question raised by the information compiled for this paper concerns the relationship between the density of the rural population and the services and functions of the central place that has been heretofore reconstructed. Lone Star provided only a minimum number of services and functions when the surrounding rural population was greatest. As the rural population declined from the 1880's onward, Lone Star acquired more and more sophisticated social, economic and service functions. At first glance this situation appears to contradict assumptions frequently made about small rural towns and their decline in the 20th century. First of all, one must account for the relatively low level of general functions and services provided by the central place when the rural population was at its greatest. The large rural population of the latter decades of the 19th century either could not afford, could not use or did not need the many local services and functions that later appeared centralized at Lone Star. Available evidence indicates that many early rural residents of the area were both extremely poor and transient. Many moved into "back-woods" plots farmed primitively, cut wood, hunted, trapped, "worked out" and moved on with hardly a trace even in the memories of their immediate neighbors. This type of rural American could only afford a minimum of economic and institutional services. He had limited means to travel even a few miles, and yet he did not stay in one place long enough to become "established." No doubt people left the area for a large variety of reasons, not all of them economic. Life in the not too distant cities beckoned with attractive cultural variety as well as jobs. The rise of mechanized agriculture lessened the need for farm labor or second and third sons. Periodic depression in agricultural prices, especially in the 1890's and the 1930's, tended to push out more marginal residents. Also, there is some evidence that strong ties with families and other social groupings may have mitigated against the centralization of social and institutional functions and, therefore, of community cohesion. Swedes, Blacks and even "Missourians" were some of the identifiable groups that were somewhat agglomerated within a few miles of Lone Star.

Secondly, one must try to account for the rise of the town of Lone Star and all that it eventually came to present. One clear, and perhaps most significant cause, was the rise of prosperity that began in the late 1890's and continued almost without interruption until immediately after the First World War. The older members of the community became socially and economically better established. Many had "paid for" land plus money to buy desired services and to develop local institutions. They also made gains in mobility but it was not yet the kind of mobility that would eventually tie the whole rural community very strongly to Lawrence 12 miles away. At first the use of automobiles clearly helped tie the rural population to the central place, that is, Lone Star. Major marketing and the purchase of expensive manufactured goods had always taken place in Lawrence; the use of the automobile did not change this economic tie, it only speeded up the process somewhat. Routinely driving to Lawrence every day or so for work, shopping or entertainment was not a practice instantly developed with the acquisition of a Model T Ford. On the other hand the temptation to visit one's neighbors, or just to go to "town" (Lone Star) and see what was going on, was less frequently resisted. The initial impact of the automobile was no doubt more social than economic and it played a key role in growing community cohesion.

The long term effects of prosperity, mobility and the whole increasing mechanization of American society tended to reduce both the rural population and importance of rural small towns. This change is not something that could occur suddenly; if for no other reason than the fact that the terrible roads would not allow it. The enormous long range impact of these changes clearly tended to obscure the transitional features of the overall process. It is left to the local historian to preserve the detail necessary for a thorough understanding of that overall process.

¹Lone Star was known as Bond between 1875 and the late 1890's when the name was changed to Lone Star. Bond was the name of the original postmaster. Lone Star was the name given to a new school in 1897.

²An atlas published in 1873 mentions no businesses of any kind at the site of what became Bond (Lone Star) nor does its maps show any buildings at all. It does show the present day road layout with the town's cross-roads and a ford across Washington Creek to the south. It is easy to speculate that these features provide the key to the initial development of the town. Atlas of Douglas Co. Kansas (New York: J.W. Beers and Co., 1873), p. 59-60.

¹²Actually, other evidence (including recollections as well as the census records) indicates a much sharper decline of rural population between the late 1880's and the early 1920's. The declining rural population was only partially compensated for by the rising town population.

¹³If one is interested in the total population of the town or the rural community, the multiplication of the number of residences times five will yield the approximate total. This writer speculates that the population of the Lone Star community falls somewhere between 250 and 300 in first two decades of the 20th century.

¹⁴The reduction in family size can account for some additional decline. But, clearly, external factors were at work as well causing many, many families to move away.

"A KANSAS SOUVENIR"

Thirty years ago, along the eastern margin of the grassy quadrangle which geographers called Kansas, the rude forefathers of Atchison, Leavenworth, Wyandotte, Lawrence and Topeka, slept in the intervals of their strife with petty tyrants of their fields, and beyond their western horizon, the rest was silence, solitude and the wilderness, to the Rio Grande; to Yellowstone; to the Sierra Nevada; like the lonely steppes of Turkestan and Tartary; inhabited by wandering tribes whose occupation was war; whose pastime was the chase; pastured for untold centuries by roaming herds that followed the seasons in their recurring migrations from the arctic circle to the Gulf.

Censorious scoffers, actuated by envy, jealousy, malignity and other evil passions have hinted that he unduly vaunteth himself; that he brags and becomes vainglorious; that he is given to bounce, tall talk and magniloquence.

There have not been wanting those who affirm that he magnifies his calamities as well as his blessings, and desires nothing so much as to have the name of Kansas in any capacity always in the ears and mouths of men.

Such accusations are well calculated to make the judicious grieve. They result from a misconception of the man and his environment.

"A Kansas Souvenir"

It is a distinctly American State, with a trivial fraction of illiteracy, the largest school population, and but one detected criminal to two thousand of its inhabitants.

QUERIES

Queries are free to members. They should state at least two facts to gain the best results. There are many of our ancestors who have the same first and last names and this might hasten our answers.

Queries are for the present time free to non-members. They must concern Kansas related ancestors of fifty years or more.
